

I was born in Australia and started working when I was 15 years and 10 months old. I have worked ever since. I have never been on any sort of Government unemployment benefit.

This is no big deal. However, now that I am aged 65, I still have to keep paying the same level of tax as a younger person. Where is the reward for working for 50 years and helping to build this country?

I believe that I should be entitled to a tax concession in line with the Age Pension annual benefit, ie., a concession based on the single Age Pension if I am single, or based on the married Age Pension if we are both of pensionable age.

I do not believe that this is asking too much, as I am not a burden on society in my older age. It may also keep us older people working longer.

Jeff Webb

[removed for privacy reasons]